Police Officer Wellness

Officer Representing wellness

Police officers face a unique set of challenges that can take a toll on their mental and physical health. From the grueling demands of shift work to chronic exposure to traumatic incidents, the stresses of law enforcement are pervasive and come in many forms. While the primary focus is often on the public's safety, the health and wellness of those who protect and serve are equally important.

Law Enforcement Suicide Prevention

Distressed Officer

Gun crime investigations continue to be a priority for law enforcement agencies. Challenges abound, though, starting with the fact that less than 20% of gunfire incidents are reported to police in the first place. That's compounded by the ongoing staffing shortages in law enforcement agencies and the outdated and awkward systems many agencies rely on for tracking incidents and managing their investigations.

Paws That Help: How Therapy Dogs Improve Police Officer Wellness

Officer with Service Dog

Police officers and all first responders are not strangers to high-stress, emotionally intense, and physically demanding situations on the job. Over time, constant exposure to these challenges can wear on mental and physical health. Prioritizing police officer wellness is crucial for long-term health and well-being. Therapy dogs can be a helpful wellness tool in law enforcement.

National Consortium in Preventing Law Enforcement Suicide Toolkit

The toolkit is part of the resources available from the work done by the National Consortium on Preventing Law Enforcement Suicide. The Consortium was formed in 2018 by the International Association of Chiefs of Police (IACP) with other partners to prevent suicide and raise awareness of suicide among law enforcement officers.
